Despite the schism in the Methodists, the church continued to thrive. The Believers Meeting House in Chapel Street became the headquarters of the New Wesleyan Methodist Church, which was formed in 1855. The new church was built in 1856, and it quickly became one of the largest and most influential in the area.

The church was led by Rev. Adam Averell, who was known for his fiery sermons and his dedication to the cause of Methodism. Under his leadership, the church grew rapidly, and it soon became one of the most important in the area.

In 1872, the church was expanded to accommodate its growing congregation. The new building was equipped with a fine organ, and it quickly became one of the most beautiful and impressive in the town.

The Methodists, however, were not immune to the challenges of the times. In the late 19th century, the church was facing significant competition from the Anglican Church, which had a long history in the area. The Methodists were determined to maintain their place in the community, and they worked hard to attract new members and to retain those who had already joined the church.

Despite these challenges, the church continued to thrive. In the early 20th century, the Methodists were at the forefront of the campaign to end slavery in the United States, and they played a key role in the organizing of the annual conference of the Methodist Church.

In the years that followed, the church continued to grow, and it remained one of the most important in the area. Today, the Wesleyan Methodist Church is a vibrant community that continues to serve the people of the town with dedication and commitment.
